

Contrast people of your age with those of your parents.

Due to rapid development of technology, the world is evolving very fast; consequently, it affects the individuals and their way of thinking. In fact, opinion of current generation people is far more different than those of their parents in a number of ways.

First, priorities of younger and older people are different. This tendency can be observed in preferences in education fields. For example, a few decades ago, people mainly concentrated on learning applied sciences, such as mathematics, chemistry, and physics; however, these days modern generation focus on studying technology-based subjects, namely science, software engineering, and computer science. Moreover, younger people and their parents have different opinions in choosing profession. For instance, older generation representatives preferred to be a doctor, a lawyer, or a professor; on the other hand, current generation is more interested in modern professions, such as a YouTube blogger, a singer, or an artist. Considering the aforementioned points, it is worth to note that younger generation and their parents prioritize different things.

Second, younger generation members and their parents have different lifestyles. The routines of the individuals are changed primarily because of the advances in technology. These days, a young person obtains and shares new information using social networks, but an elderly person prefers to read a newspaper to get the latest news. Also, their past-time activities after work are considerably changed. The older generation people like to have dinner with their loved ones and spend time watching TV before going to bed. In contrast, current generation individuals prefer eating out and spend time alone by surfing the Internet or watching YouTube. In addition, the hobbies of two groups of people are dissimilar, meaning that, elderly people enjoy spending time with their family members, while the younger people love travelling. Therefore, the lifestyle of younger people has been significantly transformed in contrast to that of their parents.

Finally, beliefs of the elderly people and their children have been significantly changed. This trend is obvious in terms of taking risk. For example, elderly people preferred safer means of saving money, like making deposit in a bank, while younger generation is more eager to risk by buying stocks or investing their capital into startups. Further, tolerance of different aged people has become different, too. A clear example of this is acceptance of LGBT community by younger generation, while the elderly people consider them as taboo. Overall, these facts reveal that younger people and their parents possess different beliefs.

In conclusion, the world is changing rapidly, which, by no means, influences the way people think. For this reason, opinions of the current generation and their parents may not always match. This is especially noticeable in priorities, lifestyles, and beliefs of the younger and older people.
